A plan which calls for the assignment of either the Bureau of Mines or the Bureau of Standards, or both, to the task of seeing that the government's buildings are properly erected and guarded from the danger of fires was broached to the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds yesterday and poor alike. They died for the nation. Buildings and Grounds yesterday in a way that may cause abandonment of arrangements of that committee for the compilation of a government building code.

EXPERTS EXPLAIN.

Two of the country's best authorities on fire prevention appeared before the committee and startled its member of the government's problem. In a few words they demonstrated that Uncle Sam has already at hand in the officials of the Bureau of Mines and the Bureau of Standards the most effective fire prevention corps that could de devised; that, in fact, he already has organized and ready, a far more ef-fective means of safeguarding his pub-lic buildings than the most complete set of laws and penalties that could be

W. H. Merrill, president of the National Fire Protective Association, of Chicago, and George W. Babb, chairman of the National Board of Fire Under writers, appeared before the Public Buildings Committee yesterday and demonstrated that there was little need of drawing up extensive regulations on the subject of fire control.

"Place an effective bureau or an effec-tive person in charge of this work," the gentlemen said, "and you will advance farther in a year than you will ever pro-gress if you insist upon sitting down and working out a maze of laws upon the subject."

They pointed out that the Bureau of Mines has a finely equipped corps for the prevention of fires in mines. "Why not extend their services by agencies serviceable in case of fire, Bureau is Effective, the responsibility for fires upon such a bureau," it was asserted, "and in short order, statute or no statute, fire with the sounding of the assembly by code or no fire code, there would be a demand for the removal of wooden file followed with invocation by Rev. E. H. cases, the proper stowage of heaps of inflammable documents, and the abatement of congested quarters."

It was pointed out by the two fire experts that the government's Rureau of Standards was called upon to standardize the weights and measures and various ties, therefore this bureau could gineer Band. accomplish the standardization of government buildings.

It was suggested that a fireproof standard be established and rigidly followed, and it was asserted that the Bureau of Standards, with the mere authorization such a matter, it was demonstrated, resulted in the building being left with oldfashioned windows and therefore it became a prey to the flames.

The experts also called attention to the fact that the House Office Building was view of the lack of fireproofing on the

More than 500 men were in line, some so feeble and aged they could hardly keep up with the procession. It was feared some would succumb to the heat, but no casualties were reported. That it will not be long when there will be no veterans was demonstrated by the scant numbers in line yesterday.

or moral and social virtue, and brotherly love, relief, and truth are inculcated in its precepts.

Many distinguished persons have served as grand masters of this rite, among whom may be named the Duke of Cumberland, brother of George III, who was succeeded by the Prince of Wales, afterward George IV: Henry VII. Cardinal Woolsey. Inigo Jones, and Christopher Wren.

Modern Freemasonry was introduced into France in 1725, Russia in 1721, and Germany in 1745. There are now lodges in almost every country on the globe. The first lodge of Freemasons in America was established in Boston in 1725, in Philadelphia in 1724. Of this latter named lodge Benjamin Franklin was very worshipful grand master. Upon the introduction of Freemasonry in Virginia George Washington became a member of the order.
